On Job God Talk And

Today, I finished my first book of the year: On Job: God-Talk and the Suffering of the Innocent by Gustavo Gutiérrez and wow, was this one a doozy. It definitely gets 5 stars from me. Job's burden, reconciling unimaginable suffering with the idea of a just God, is a task one that few preachers or academics are bold enough to tackle.

Theology is talk about God. According to the Bible, however, God is a mystery, and at the beginning of his Summa TheologiaeThomas Aquinas states as a basic principle governing all theological reflection that "we cannot know what God is but only what God is not:" Must we not think, then, that theology sets itself an impossible task?. No, the task is not impossible.

Job wants God to straighten this out. If Job is innocent, God should acquit him. If he is guilty, God should tell him what is the offense so that he can confess, change, and maybe end the suffering. God does not declare Job innocent or guilty. God changes the subject and begins to talk about the wonders of the world that God had created.

Job 38:1-18 - God Finally Speaks to Job - Enter the Bible

Seeking fruitful ways to talk about God from the perspective of innocent suffering (a concern grounded in commitment to the poor of Latin America), Gutierrez focuses on two types of language Job discovers: that of prophecy , as he generalizes beyond his own plight to the suffering of others, and that of contemplation , as he responds to the voice in the whirlwind.

Job 30:18-25 Job 30:18-25 adds more complaints that essentially claim, "If I, Job, can see these problems, why can't God?And yet He does nothing!" His mindset is such now that he is blaming God for everything that goes wrong in his life. The sum of these charges is that God is guilty while Job is an innocent victim of God's blind, uncaring negligence.
